

Please, please don't inact the TPMS. For those who want it, it is already available as an option on a number of vehicles for sale in this country. Don't force it down the throats of those of us for whom it would be not a service, but a severe hinderence.

A mandatory TPMS would actually inhibit safety. You would be forced to run OEM tires, which are, in most cases, worthless. A better tire, or a snow tire in winter, is going to go much farther in promoting road safety then some absurd idiot light on the dash and increased rotational mass. Junk that makes a car heavier is bad, and this agency needs to learn that ( $F=MA$  afterall).

Believe it or not, I actually own a tire pressure gauge. It would probably be cheaper to the cost of a new car if you just mandated that each car was sold with a pressure gauge and instructions on its use. Trying to regulate stupidity and laziness is folley and nothing but a detriment to those responsible.

A mandatory TPMS would only inhibit those who don't want it as its already available to those who do, it would drive up the cost of a new vehicle, and it would reduce safety by making tire changes more difficult and expensive. How about useing a little common sense and scraping this idiocy.
